FORGET THE QUOTATIONS

Many a Liberty Bond holder has worried considerably in the last few months about the bond quotations on the stock exchanges. It has seemed to them that their lending money to Uncle Sam was a losing investment.

They should forget these quotations. They aren't hurting the man who is holding his bonds. They hurt only those who insist upon selling out.

And the fact that they are quoted below par today doesn't mean that they are always to remain so. Not by any means. When the war began steel corporation stock was quoted at something like $30 a share. Today this same common is selling around $97.

Other industrial stocks made similar gains, some even greater, during the war period. Now that munitions making is ended some of them are dropping back.

There is nothing behind them to guarantee their value save the law of supply and demand. Nothing to insure their paying anything in dividends next year.

But behind every Liberty Bond is the government's guarantee that the interest will be paid promptly when due.

These bonds aren't dependent upon industrial conditions. Uncle Sam promises to pay. And he will pay.

So keep your bonds. Forget the quotations.

Buy as many as you can afford.

You can't lose.
